Sight Fundraising Group which involves everyone who has a part in the project, and is the most fun! Each group liaises with all the other groups to ensure everyone gets updated information with the garden's progress.

Sound Local architects, professional gardeners, councillors, and schools are giving the project a helping hand, and many Argyll and Bute Council departments are providing help and advice with the requirements of the garden.

Touch Still to come...

Taste With committee's organised, paper work in progress and a shared vision in place, the focus is shifting on to reconstructing the land and building foundations for the likes of wheelchair access. The project is now looking for the support of local building suppliers, and community sponsorship.

What it means to our community...

For key committee members, and the rest of the community the garden will mean different things to different people.

Kerry and Joanna think that the people of Oban will really appreciate it.

'The sensory garden means that a whole community is coming together,' said Kerry. 'I am doing something worthwhile for the whole community.'

Joanna commented: 'We are making something for the community to love and enjoy.'

Graham also agrees.

'Getting the community involved is a good thing and at least it is involving others with disabilities,' he said.

And for Mairi, the garden will also provide a learning experience.

'It is nice to be in the sensory garden because I want to know a lot of things about plants,' she said. 'It is good to have the community involved as well because it brings everyone together.'
